The Only Multi-Racial Worldwide Indigenous Confederacy In Existence

Edith Bolling Galt Wilson (Powhatan).

The only First Lady to be titled "Mrs. President," she was indeed the closest the United States ever came to having a woman President. For eighteen crucial months in America's history, as President Woodrow Wilson lay incapacitated, it was this Algonkian descendant who ran the government from the White House, and was fairly popular as well. When a reporter was able to speak to Mr. Wilson, and said, "We have all been praying for you," the ailing Prez retorted, "Which way?"

The only President to date to become engaged and marry while in the Oval Office, Mr. Wilson (and his widowed fiancée) was under intense public scrutiny from the start. She made no secret of her documented "Old Virginia" Bolling lineage from the "Red Rolfes," of Pocahontas' children. She herself was the seventh of eleven children, a 5'9" beauty and inheritor of Galt's Jewelry store, which she ran until her marriage to Wilson. She then sold it to the employees "at cost."

It was Woodrow Wilson who acknowledged the one and a half million women who entered the workforce during World War I and decided to support women's suffrage in 1917. Ironic, because he later supported one of America's greatest working women, Edith Galt Wilson. Her eighteen month "regency" was without major flaws.

Mrs. Wilson died on December 28, 1961, the day of the opening of The Wilson Bridge, which spans the Potomac, and connects her Old Virginia to President Wilson's Washington. Her former home is now the Wilson Museum in Washington, D.C
